Fire Truck House Letter to the Community

[content warning: anti-black violence, murder]

To Black people at Stanford (including those involved in writing this letter) -

We know that as painful, infuriating, and exhausting as this moment is, none of this is new. We know that anti-Black violence has persisted for centuries, and that institutions like our University uphold and perpetuate the systemic racism that we have been battling our entire lives.

We are experiencing an uprising in real time. Our ancestors have been here before. Many generations before us have been organizing at the forefront for Black Liberation. Many of them, Black women, Black trans and queer people, and Black disabled people, were organizing while holding multiple identities that compounded the violence enacted upon them. They faced off with police and other violent institutions, refusing to be silenced and ignored. They faced off with their oppressors for the liberation of ALL Black people. We are continuing their legacy, propelling a movement that has spread across the globe.

We (QSR & WCC professional staff) support your journey in this moment. The journey looks different for every Black person; whether it’s unplugging from the news to prioritize your own mental health; celebrating Black love and joy with your friends and family; organizing with your local community; centering your work on Black queer, trans and disabled people whose names and stories often go under the radar; creating art; taking the time and space to mourn the loss of life; connecting others to resources; the list is endless. No matter what you decide to do, we support you in your fight for Black Liberation. We will make it through this, too.

To white and non-Black people of color at Stanford (including the white and non-black POC involved in writing this letter) -

You know this isn’t new. You’ve seen anti-Black racism perpetuated by your friends, your family, your communities, and this institution. You have perpetuated anti-Black racism yourself. You know that anti-Black violence has persisted for centuries, and that police and institutions like our University uphold and perpetuate systemic racism that harms Black people in so many ways. You know we need to do better because Black life is at stake.

You are witnessing an uprising in real time. It is up to you to follow the lead of Black people and use your privilege and resources to support the movement for Black Liberation.
There are many ways you can show up to support Black people, whether that’s creating a protective barrier from police for Black people on the front lines or other necessary efforts. Remember that all Black life is under threat and has been for a long time. Nina Pop, Tony McDade, Breonna Taylor, and George Floyd are but four of many Black people whose lives have been stolen. It is your job to learn the names and stories of Black people who were victims of anti-Black violence, including Black trans and cis women, Black trans men, Black Trans and queer people, and Black disabled people. No matter where or when instances of anti-Black violence occur, you will find the same underlying thread that weaves them all together: “[name here] was killed for being Black.”

You cannot stop at learning the names and stories of Black people who were taken from us. You are also tasked with listening, learning, doing your own research on what is needed in your local community, and acting accordingly. No matter what you decide to do, you must refuse the status quo. You must refuse complacency. You must support the fight for Black Liberation.

To everyone –

Our colleagues at the BCSC, The Markaz, and El Centro have compiled resources that we have shared below. We added a few additional resources because the list is constantly evolving. Your community may have resources specifically for Black people in your area, so make sure to keep an eye out for those as well. Please engage how and where makes sense for you. Remember that we all have a part to play in this movement and that we are stronger together.

With care, rage, and support,
